

Name

Professor

Subject

Date

Argumentative Essay About Voting

Voting is a right every citizen is entitled to exercise. Voting increases citizens' power, making it one of the most important rights a person can have. However, voting has downsides, such as influencing the outcome of elections and corruption. Therefore, voting is crucial because it gives power but must be used responsibly. Voting is the most essential right the people have as citizens. Elections determine who will represent us in government and make decisions on our behalf (National Academies of Sciences). It is a right that every citizen should have. If people do not vote, they have no say in who runs their country. This is a central democratic right that everyone should exercise as often as possible. Not everyone feels the same way about voting. Some people do not feel that voting is vital as they do not believe that elections change anything. They believe politicians will behave the same regardless of who wins the elections. Although opponents do not think voting is essential, voting has many benefits, such as giving citizens a say, reflecting transparency in the decisions, and positively impacting every citizen's decision-making.

The first significant benefit of using voted election results is that it gives citizens a say in whom to elect in power. With much money spent on campaigns, it is easier to spend more on lobbying. When this happens, those with positions and privileges become even more expensive to hire and retain. Politicians take advantage since they know they can get elected just because they are famous (National Academies of Sciences). One way politicians gain popularity is through advertisements that target high numbers of potential voters in large cities and regions. While many individuals know about one another or support each other's views, some do not know much about their opponents. Voters play a part in electing officials that will represent them effectively. Since voters are influential, they can choose which politician best suits their needs. Having a large number of supporters means that they have more room for representation in a higher office. A successful candidate will have good policies that have been put in place to govern the country and ensure everyone gets a fair share of resources to thrive (Li et al.). Moreover, they will receive recognition from organizations that give them good publicity. These things ensure that the right people get into leadership positions in the future.

The second benefit includes having more transparency in the decisions the ruling class makes. Any citizen can ask any question related to their local area and know if their leaders are telling the truth (Li et al.). This is done anonymously until the public learns of the outcome. At various levels of governance, it becomes clear who makes the final decision. Sometimes, certain people within a system use unfair tactics to win votes from some groups. There are always instances when candidates promise to give everyone a good job or house they deserve but later realize they do not receive it.

The third advantage is that many issues affecting the American people are addressed at the federal level. On the state level, the main agenda should be to develop a cohesive plan to create a united nation without division. Citizens still living in poverty and fearing losing everything by supporting an incumbent president or congressperson will feel betrayed by every decision they make. Therefore, the three reasons mentioned are crucial since they promote unity among the citizens and encourage them to participate. Addressing numerous concerns is the best way to empower people in society and encourage peaceful coexistence. An example is Obama's stimulus bill in 2009 that helped millions of Americans.

Opponents use a few different arguments to argue that voting is not essential. One argument is that voting does not change anything. They argue that the government would still be corrupt and ineffective even if everyone voted. Another argument is that voting wastes time (Maxwell and Shields). They say that it takes too much time and effort to research candidates and make an informed decision and that most people vote based on name recognition or party affiliation. Finally, some opponents argue that voting is unimportant because one person's vote cannot make a difference. They believe that with millions of people voting, one person's vote is simply a drop in the bucket and has no real impact.

Although opponents have some valid reasons for saying that voting is not essential, proponents believe that voting significantly impacts minority groups, such as minorities and immigrants, who face discrimination and isolation. For instance, the Republican Party is currently facing challenges concerning illegal immigration. After several unsuccessful attempts to reform the Immigration Reform and Control Act, Republicans want to increase deportation measures. Their arguments are valid since it was clearly shown that people who cross borders return because they cannot afford the cost of living. Millions of asylum seekers are languishing in prison for making the wrong decision when they enter the country. Eliminating strict immigration rules would reduce overcrowding since many would opt to stay home instead of sending their children to school (Maxwell and Shields). For the pro side, the truth is that voting is one of the most important things we can do as citizens. Voting allows everyone to have a say in the decisions that affect their lives and the lives of their families. It is a way to hold people elected officials accountable and to make their voices heard. When people do not vote, they cede power to those who do, allowing them to make decisions for everyone without their input. Thus, voting is an essential part of our democracy, and everyone needs to participate.

In conclusion, it is vital to note that voting may sound easy, but it presents a unique challenge. It requires an individual to research their choices carefully and select the best person who has the capability to represent them. Individuals are usually faced with opposing forces that want them to give up their beliefs and preferences to other people. Depending on the type of choice being given, one may sacrifice their comfort in politics and personal life. Despite this, it is a valuable tool that offers an avenue for self-expression since it enables people to decide the kind of leader they want to be elected. The same goes for the media, media outlets, and the internet, where citizens are able to view information and make informed choices. Finally, one can start learning about various ideas that align with their social values. Consequently, they will find themselves represented in a manner that best fits their beliefs.

Works Cited

Li, Quan, et al. "Cost of Voting in the American States." Election Law Journal: Rules, Politics, and Policy, vol. 17, no. 3, 2018, pp. 234–47.

Maxwell, Angie, and Todd Shields. The Long Southern Strategy: How Chasing White Voters in the South Changed American Politics. Oxford University Press, USA, 2019.

National Academies of Sciences, Engineering. Securing the Vote: Protecting American Democracy. National Academies Press, 2018.